A Spanish court has sentenced former Catalan leader Oriol Junqueras to 13 years in prison, while two others convicted of sedition are to serve six years. Both the sentence and the prison term handed down on Monday apply to Junqueras, who was in charge of the Catalan government when it declared independence in October 2017. He was also the driving force behind a push to secede from Spain. He and two other separatist politicians - former vice president Oriol Soler and activist Jordi Sanchez - were found guilty last month of sedition and misuse of public funds for their roles in leading the illegal referendum. The court also ordered all three to pay €430,000 ($487,000) in fines. But the sentence was reduced to 13 years in prison, with a further €430,000 fine and community service, due to his early guilty plea. Junqueras' sentence will be served at a prison near Barcelona. Soler and Sanchez will serve their sentences in prison in southern Spain, the judges said. The court also struck down Junqueras' leadership of the ANC, a pro-independence grassroots group, but kept it running. The sentence represents a minor victory for the government of Spanish Prime Minister Pedro Sanchez, who says he is determined to end the turmoil in Catalonia. The vote triggered several months of tense standoffs between the Spanish central government and Catalan authorities that included street protests, tear gas and dozens of injured people. Spain's constitutional court dissolved the region's parliament and banned the referendum. Junqueras maintains that the referendum was to establish a dialogue with the central government and reject independence.
